Love Actually - Love Calculator Screenshots: This invention relates to thermal insulation of wall panels and, more particularly, to an insulation system which may be applied without the use of mechanical fasteners to wall panel assemblies. Thermal and acoustic wall panels are frequently used in the construction of buildings because they substantially insulate the interior of the building from outdoor environmental forces. Such panels typically comprise a plurality of panes of material such as gypsum board, fiberboard, cellular glass, or brick faced gypsum wallboard, gypsum lath, plaster board, or fiberglass. The panels are installed in a building to provide a barrier to keep the environmental forces such as, for example, the sun's heat and light out of the building. To do this, the panels are supported in openings or cavities defined by the walls of the building and are typically nailed or otherwise fastened to the walls. The fasteners are usually hidden by insulation panels extending beyond the edges of the support panels and fastening panels, and are generally concealed from view. The fasteners typically are from 0.5 to 1.5 inches in width and are applied during the construction process. One problem which has plagued the construction industry is the spalling of the gypsum of gypsum wallboard and the fiberglass of fiberglass wallboard due to the high temperature of the supporting plaster. The stucco of plaster board also has the same problem when applied to a wall. Such spalling and lack of strength of the gypsum and glass can also occur in the lath or plaster lath of other types of panels. A variety of materials and methods for applying thermal and acoustic insulation to wall panels have been proposed to overcome this problem. See, for example, U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,500,290; 4,455,801; 4,261,421; 4,144,976; 3,958,349; and 3,680,730. While the prior art has attempted to solve the problems associated with the lack of strength of the panels, it has not addressed the problem of utilizing thermal insulation panels which have been installed within a building without the need of mechanical fasteners, as well as having a system for insulating the panel which is aesthetically attractive and is easy and economical to apply. Thus, there is a
